“And I ran my hands through the lovely fine tresses of their hair, their beautiful long hair which they had so carefully and lovingly cared for, and laughed about so often with their friends, and with their mothers, laughing, smiling, dreaming about their future Loves, the boys who would be their Men, and the fathers to their children in turn, and then – and then, so suddenly – then, like a storm-swept shroud overpowering the light, like a black demon wing sweeping away sun and moon and stars, only blackness, and falling, falling into the screaming of sisters' and mothers' and brothers' and fathers' and all those boys' blood, all their blood, and falling into the earth, and the cracks of the rifles and pistols not stopping, and the horror, the horror, the horror, before, at long last, The Light, and the Grace of Angels lifting them up to the Great Supreme One, Ain En Sof, judging and blessing, and promising, yea, promising, that your long beautiful tresses, and your dreams, and your laughter and your love, would never ever be forgotten, no, would always be singing the songs of Life, forever, as long as there will be sons who will be true men and men who will be true Sons of the Lord, the High, the Elohim.”
